During the Boxer rebellion in China the warships of eight al-lied nations, England, Francs, Germany, Italy, Austria, Russia, Japan and the United Status, were lying at the mouth of the Pei-Ho river, leading to Poking. On the banks of the river, and guarding its entrance, were the Taku forts, garrisoned by Chi-nese soldiers. At a critical juncture of the rebellion seven of the admirals united in a demand for the evacuation or surrender of the forts, the demand being accompanied by a threat to fire on them unless it was immediately compiled with. But Rear Admiral Kempff, in command of the American squadron, refused to join in the demand, on the ground that he was not author-ized to initiate any act of war country was at peace. His in-structions, he claimed, did not permit him to commit an overt act of war The other com-manders argued and inelated, but he steadfastly refused. It is a part of an admiral's business to fight, and it was no doubt a great temptation to join in the bombardment. Had he yielded, he probably would have been austained by public opinion at home. But he had the moral courage to stand by his concep-tion of his duty under his in-
